In response to the Trump administration's rapid dismantling of federal websites, the Environmental Data & Governance Initiative (EDGI) has relaunched its Federal Environmental Web Tracker. EDGI has long monitored thousands of federal webpages related to climate, energy, and the environment. The Federal Environmental Web Tracker makes records of significant changes to federal environmental websites publicly available in a searchable database.

Changes to the information that's available on federal websites demonstrate how public information is leveraged for political means. The flurry of executive orders in the Trump administration's first weeks have accompanied the disappearance of critical data on agency websites. The information found (or not found) on a federal website can facilitate or hamper public participation and research around crucial environmental policy issues.
