

I Loved Them All

Curiosity more than hunger or lust
- Robin Morgan

I loved them all she said and most still do for all the usual unexplainable reasons — touching parts of me that needed touching, letting me touch them, to hold and be held by when two alone were still miracle enough.

This one would take me abruptly, out of the blue, an almost mythological ravishing, then, satisfied, but not quite content we would gaze at one another obliquely, abstractly, trying to figure out what we were doing to and with each other in the real world.

This one courted the lady in me: flowers, compliments, deference, respect, not fawning or abject but gentlemanly, never touch me without my smile or nod, some sign, then as we would get into it hold himself back until I opened myself to the power I'd given him over me.

This one was such a good sport about it, in it for the exercise the feeling of accomplishment and just reward the rush to push us over the finish line.

This one loved to look at me naked, slide his hands over me like the mere feel was intoxicating — not adoring the way some do as if you were delicate or fragile but as if he wanted to be absorbed, wanted to know me that way, wanted me to know he knew, better than he knew himself.

This one wanted it always to depend on him, and though afterwards he'd laugh at himself for what he called his macho side, that's what it almost always came down to.
What I liked was watching him lose control.

This one could never get enough.
Satiated but unsatisfied.
Said he was one of those men who would go to the grave knowing however much he'd had would never be enough to fill the need he felt such pure desire entitled him to — eyelids too heavy to keep open bodies too close to tell apart but unwilling to fall asleep for fear each time would be the last.

This one was like a protective brother.

This one, no different from most, wanted me to keep nothing from him — no secrets share everything — except that instead of looking for a way to own me with all that private information he was looking for a lover to open to, soul friend as well as soul mate, to see our shadows in broad daylight, our self-understanding deeper by the power of two to ease the labor-pains of self-exposure.

This one intrigued me, something worth exploring always likely to turn up on our weekends together, a pretty good fit when making a living came first thing for both of us every Monday morning.

This one inspired us both to acts of charity.

This one was prototype Eastern Shore — a steel-trap intellect, biting wit, photographic memory and money — who to his heart surgeon father's sorrow washed out of Anapolis where he'd excelled in mechanical engineering and freestyle wrestling, but did very well in West Indies imports, had yards of porn on his bookshelves, a portrait of Maharishi on his bedroom wall and felt red velvet cords helped make up for his shame

This one was a kind of useful idiot — cute, amiable, available whenever what was needed was low key small talk get-togethers — relaxation, relief, release and not a lot of strings attached.

This one, hung up between his mother abusing him and the commandment to honor her, bounced back and forth between rage and empty-eyed silence, wanted me to somehow make up for the love he'd never had.
For a long time I convinced myself good sex wasn't all that important until one day compassion turned into pity and I told him to go find an analyst or wet nurse.

This one loved falling in love, made it easy to set aside the years of worldly wisdom, step with him into a light-hearted bright-eyed giddy wonderland — all those delicious memories confused frightened excited trusting uncanny synchronicity numinous coincidence everything significant all the clichés fresh again all love songs our song all romances reflections of ours each glance each word a revelation smiles innocent of pretense only the two of us in focus a clairvoyant intimacy more in love the closer we got loving both what and that we were.

This one could almost see he was ashamed of, disgusted with, himself for being so abjectly in love.

This one would go on explaining his words and reasons as long as he thought I was following and if not (which was the case more than he guessed) would stop and explain his argument again while I followed the way his lips and eyes danced to his voice.

This one said I was the only woman who made him feel she loved him, then complained I contradicted myself when I said to love isn't the same as being in love, though I was clear from the start all I was into with him was friends with benefits; that if he didn't lighten up he'd spoil a good thing; that nice as it was sometimes, his passion had nothing to do with me but was a prurient growth of his fantasy world, a dark hole all his own only he could fill.

This one couldn't get past the idea that once we'd had sex we had to be in love or married or bound up some other way.

This one said it's always something and for us that was when I told him I agreed with those who say seduction is a kind of rape as if, he said, violence and friendly persuasion are the same; just more victim-villain porn, damsel-in-distress, poor thing taken advantage of, spirit unwilling but flesh all too too, a condemnation of even the old do-si-do couples have always gone through to talk ourselves into it.
Affinity becoming intimacy he called it, quoting somebody or other, the fine art of winning the loved one's love.

We never were as close after that.

This one, those of you who say I think too much, or like a man, will be glad to know, I can't find words for even now, years since he left.
Violet-blue eyes that saw deep into mine.

This one insisted that taken for granted was exactly what we should be for each other.

This one said nothing occupies men's minds like the bodies of women and I if I knew it or not was the kind of woman who had the power to suffuse a man, haunt him like a witch's spell, a possession too easy he said to confound with love.

This one wasn't younger than his years but fit physically and mentally, both grace and gravity, more than enough libido, never in a hurry to get anywhere else so sometimes we would just cuddle for hours, content, but he insisted the chemistry must be there until the very end; reminding me now and then that for better or worse I would be the last woman in his life.
When he was alone he obsessed about death every day being that much closer.

This one said he always fell in love too easily and though he knew he would get hurt again he saw I needed to be reminded what love felt like so I could get out of the mess I was in while the getting was good.

This one was taking forever to go through what someone called the radiance of the Zomboid Phase all men with any feminine consciousness seem to go through.

This one was of two minds: angels looking down on our love-making or spooks listening in; edgy at best somewhere between goth and noir, never knowing if anything ever was or could be between just the two of us.

This one might have been a perfect partner for polyamory and made it sound good — an open but committed relationship, casual but uninhibited sex with regulated communication and rules, a sense of mutual obligation and a look of real love in his eyes — but I seldom felt that versatile and besides, who has that much time?

This one wanted to be lost in me, give himself up to the feel of us touching as much as we could of each other, sensuousness its own reason flesh caressing responsive flesh speaking in tongues only we understood getting to know each other again from the inside out; the afterglow could last for days.

This one was one of those rare birds who could feel the ecstasy of romance without needing the drama of being lovers.

Color this one Mr Unrequited:
great sex à l'orientale, from hands an inch above my meridians to tantric chakra ecstasies but never crossing the line into intimacy, never letting himself love anyone else since the one he wanted but never had in his teens.

This one, no matter what we talked about — and sharing ideas was what first brought us together — it always came back to gender and our different ways of experiencing sex, love, desire and all that, and somehow the dissection didn't flatline our romance.

This one said he was a disciple of Our Lady of Perpetual Orgasm, vowed on his knees to invoke her presence as often as permitted, was glad to have me take part in what he called her rites of passage.

This one wanted me to get excited every time he got the urge, even though I usually, and eventually only, just wanted to help him get off.

This one was neither here nor there which was ok because I wasn't either.

This one took years to give up trying.

This one was all about being uptodate, done with retro puritanism, patriarchal bs of any kind, then turned out to value intellectual clarity far more than emotional intimacy:

score one more heteropessimism.

This one when we met was just beginning to see how uptight he was, how narrow his scope of pleasure, how stuck he was where he'd been since puberty.

This one was so nice, thoughtful and non-demanding, so intoxicated by the warmth we generated, it was almost impossible to feel sexual about him and my affection sort of curdled into obligation.

This one more than anything wanted to know himself, more than to understand me or us, who we were when we came together as we did more and more often for a time to escape our everyday lives, so once in a while what we called his delphian eye would close so we could see ourselves at our best as hardly half the puzzle.

This one said we had, while it lasted, an uncanny compatibility.

This one took the personal is political very personally; saw love as a strategy for the power of two to overcome the powers that be, relationship as domestic detente to ward off mutually assured destruction, love-making a sort of last resort suicide pact.

This one followed the self-help shows, said I was the victim of false memories while he was an obvious case of incomplete weaning, always confusing carnal desire and love.

This one was kind, affectionate, gentle, playful, responsive to my moods and whims at the moment, yet still his own man ready willing able to find that edge where my chastity belt unlocked and I'd go into freefall. Nothing at all about having no choice so no guilt or becoming mindless in order to be able to love, but self-surrender, surrender to myself, our foreplay suddenly incandescent — I loved the lightness of his body, the feel of him behind me, his grip, my desire his, my demand to be taken, known, undone, satisfied, fucked mens sana in corpore sano giving up giving in giving us the woman I'd always kept to myself.

This one had learned the hard way that intimacy for him meant shame and guilt for moral impurity intellectual dishonesty emotional immaturity and of course sexual inadequacy.

This one was like a book I'd already read: new levels to discover but otherwise boring.

This one said when you feel good, I feel good and when I can help you feel good, so much the better, but if you're not really there, then it's just like jacking off for me and frankly I'd rather use my hand than use you.
The energy between us multi-orgasmic, both of us believing mystical union in sexual love is the natural goal of pairing.
Sometimes I think the main reason we split up was neither of us was ready to take the next step to consummate by alchemical sacrament what nature had given us by coincidence.

This one was so hung up in his frontal cortex the best thing he could think of for us was reciprocal intellectual eroticism.

This one understood that a woman's smile on first making eye contact with a stranger, like her naturally higher eye register voice, is instinctive gesture of a person evolved to give birth and nurture, whose automatic response is both Care For and Take Care! and that underlying all my other desires, even very early ones like wanting to be called pretty or be sincerely cherished, I had always wanted to feel non-threatened, to be with people in ways that weren't so intense, so dramatic, always needing to be on edge.

This one emanated something, I don't know what to call it — not priapic or lewd or alluring — maybe hermetic — a vibe or aura that made me know I had to have him, have him have me (the voice of the Goddess through him one of our sisters said), which when it happened filled me so completely, left me so fulfilled (there is no better word) that when he left though I felt the loss there was no grief, only warm memories and this deep contentment.

This one wanted to know what I did with others I wouldn't do with him, and why, and why not.

This one was always at loose ends, a waif needing to be comforted, reassured it was ok to love, to be loved, to make love, and then the tenderness was overwhelming, a giving and receiving beyond incestuousness that opened me and opened and opened until we wept in awe and joy to be together again in that warm place before the birth of time.
